

PRESS RELEASE
For Immediate Release

The efficacy of globalization is contingent on quality of global teaming

Globalization is not a new and it is not likely to abate in the near future as world economies shift to take make the most of the individual advantages of each geographic region. There are many opportunities for those companies that are able to adequately meet the demands of a distributed organization.

Value Transformation LLC founder, speaker and author, Mr. Kim H Pries, presented a talk at the El Paso, Texas APICS group on the upsides and downsides of global teaming; for example, time zones, languages, cultures, and tools to mention a few. Each of these items can be a detriment or a bonus depending on how they are managed—in essence, resource configuration management. The largest drawback is the time required to truly build a global team; the greatest bonus arises from the trust developed over the time required to truly develop that team. Of course, all teams come to an end, but once we have served on a great team we know what it feels like, we feel the joy of working towards a common goal, and we relate to people who we will most likely choose for other great teams.

The founders of Value Transformation LLC are well versed in long-distance collaborations. In addition to working at global companies, the two founders have produced many books, magazine articles and tools together from their respective locations in the United States, and only meeting in person when they were present together at conferences. Both of them have found ways to leverage some great technologies: Skype, Dropbox, and LinkedIn. Collaborative tools are a wave of the future. Worldwide communication is here today.
